

Privacy Policy

We're keeping your information safe!

Who are we?

We are Oxford University Press. We are the owners of the website you're using, and we are responsible for keeping your personal data safe.

What is 'Personal Data'?

Personal data is any information about you, for example, your name, your email address, or even your birthday. It includes information we need so that you can use our website, for example, your login details.

Why are we using your personal data?

We need to collect some of your data so that you can use our website.

What can you ask us about your personal data?

You can always ask us:

For a copy of the information we have about you, to change the information we have about you, or to delete the information we have about you.

If you want to ask us to do something with your personal data, then please ask a grown up such as a parent or teacher who can contact us for you. They can read our adult privacy notice here that also has our contact details.